In a kingdom on a green knoll, a knight named Sir Knitty lived. He knew not the knack of fighting, nor how to use a knife in battle.

Instead, he had a different knack - he loved to knit.

With a click-clack, his knitting needles would knock against each other as he wove knots into knitted knick-knacks.

He knelt on his knee, a ball of wool in his knapsack, and began to knead it in his knuckled hands.

He would often knit beside the shiny doorknob, his favorite spot.

The other knights knew about Sir Knitty's odd knack and, quite often, giggled at his knitted knickers.

One day, a challenge came to the knoll. A dragon knocked on doors to know who was the bravest knight.

Fear caused their knobby knees to knock and kneel.

Sir Knitty, who had been knitting by his doorknob, heard the knock. He held his knitting needles like a knife, his knuckles white.

He knew the villagers' fears, but his knowledge was for yarn, not battles.

He knelt, contemplating the dragon problem. Could his knitting save them?

He needed to knot together a plan. He needed to make his knicker-knitting knack and knowledge into a dragon kneecap knockdown.

With his knowledge, Sir Knitty began to knit with steel yarn, his needles knocking fast.

He kneaded the stiff yarn, his knuckles sore, but his spirit was like a knife point.

Sir Knitty knitted a net, knotted with his know-how. His knitted net lay on his knee.

As the dragon came to the knoll, Sir Knitty let his heavy knitted net fly.

The dragon was trapped and knocked down! The villagers watched in awe from around their doorknobs.

They now knew their knight's knitting knack and knowledge was powerful.

And so, without a knife, Sir Knitty, the knitting knight, saved his village with his knapsack of knitting tools and knitting knowledge.

Sir Knitty stood on the knoll, the dragon knocked out in his knitted net.

He didn't need a knife, just his knitting needles and a knack for knots.

He knew that knitting was art, even if it hurt his knuckles.

The villagers, their knobby knees no longer knocking, acknowledged their knight.

They now knew that each knight has a skill, and even knitting could knock out a dragon.

Sir Knitty, the knitting knight, became a knitting knight legend, his tale knocking on the doors of kingdoms afar.

And his knitted knickers and knits were a hit!

Everyone wore Sir Knitty Knitted Knickers and Knits, the best brand in the kingdom.
